Ballads

Ballads are traditional narrative songs that tell a story. They are often based on real events, but they can also be fictional. Ballads were very popular in early America, and they were often used to entertain and inform people.

One of the most famous early American ballads is "The Ballad of John Henry." This song tells the story of a steel-driving man who dies in a contest with a steam-powered drill. The song is a celebration of American workers and their struggles.

Another popular early American ballad is "The Star-Spangled Banner." This song was written by Francis Scott Key in 1814, during the War of 1812. Key was inspired to write the song after he saw the American flag flying over Fort McHenry in Baltimore, Maryland, after a British attack.
