One challenge is that dual citizens may be subject to the laws of both countries. For example, a dual citizen of the United States and the United Kingdom may be required to pay taxes in both countries. Additionally, dual citizens may be subject to military service in both countries.

Another challenge is that dual citizens may have difficulty traveling between countries. Additionally, dual citizens may face discrimination from people who do not understand their dual citizenship. For example, a dual citizen of the United States and Mexico may be discriminated against by people who view them as being too American or too Mexican.
